

Call for Proposals:

Identity, Ideology and Worldviews in Global Politics

The series aims to publish innovative theoretical and empirical scholarship exploring the role of systems of belonging and meaning in global politics. It adopts a broad interpretation of identity, ideology, and worldviews to include a wide range of interrelated ideational factors and forces in international relations, such as culture, discourses, language, narratives, norms, values, beliefs, knowledge, and epistemes.

- Empirically the series is open to submissions with a substantive and critical focus on any system of belonging and meaning. These may include, but are not limited to, race(ism), gender, national(ism), civilizational, communitarian, global, religious, secular, scientific, extremist, reactionary, revolutionary, progressive, liberal/illiberal, democratic/authoritarian, and utopic/dystopic.
- The series also welcomes submissions focused primarily on theory, including investigations into the relationship between ideational factors and power, institutions, practices, networks, technology, boundaries, emotions, and any other relevant aspect of international relations.
- Thematically the series is broad, addressing any major area of global politics such as peace and security, transnational social movements, foreign policy, international order, and global governance.

The series aims to be global in orientation and philosophically, theoretically, and methodologically pluralist.

The Series Editors

Gregorio Bettiza, University of Exeter, UK

G.Bettiza@exeter.ac.uk

Stephane Baele, University of Louvain, Belgium

Stephane.Baele@uclouvain.be

Beverley Loke, Australian National University

Beverley.Loke@anu.edu.au

Interested in submitting a book?

Routledge invites academics and researchers to submit book proposals for the series to the series editors.

Publication Formats

Research Monograph

Monographs are high-level books that make an original scholarly contribution to their subject area. Primarily stocked by institutional libraries for use by researchers and academics, they may also be purchased by individuals for personal reference or having been assigned as further reading on an upper-level course. They may be authored by an individual or team; or may comprise an edited collection of chapters by several contributors.

Short Form: “Focus”

Routledge Focus is a program of short form publications. Each book contains between 20,000 and 50,000 words. They offer a flexible option for situations where there is too much material for a journal article, but not enough for a full-length book. Their length means that short form titles can potentially be published quicker than other types of book, in as few as 12 weeks. This makes them ideal for responding rapidly to topical issues and current affairs and providing concise overviews.

Supplementary Texts

Intended for use in undergraduate and graduate courses, for both emerging and established subject areas. They support students with information for their course, and guide them to further study and independent learning. Often exploring a specific aspect of a subject, they may appeal to researchers in addition to students as further reading.

Options for Open Access

Most Routledge books and chapters are eligible for Open Access (OA) publication. Routledge offers two options for authors or contributors to make individual book chapters available open access: ‘gold’ and ‘green’ open access. More information can be found here:

<https://www.routledge.com/our-products/open-access-books/publishing-oa-books>

Open Access makes published academic research freely and permanently available online for anyone anywhere to read.